BRIEF COURSE DESCRIPTION

Administrative law deals with the relationships between different branches of the state. It charts the delivery of government services and the attendant rights and interests of persons and other legal entities as recipients of those services. It is a set of principles and rules that determine how courts supervise the decisions of governmental bodies acting under (mostly) statutory powers to ensure that their dealings with their constituencies comply with the law. The course explores the various reasons courts review such decisions and also considers the varying standards of review they apply in different contexts. The course also considers administrative law in social context, examining the impact of its doctrine on diversity and equity issues. The course is a staple of public law and serves as a foundation for more specialized study in numerous other areas of public law including constitutional, immigration, labour, financial services, environmental, freedom of information, privacy, and human rights laws.

TEACHING METHODOLOGY

The course strives to be responsive to various learning styles and skill sets. As such, the traditional pure lecture method will not be followed. Instead, class time will consist of class discussion, lectures and more interactive exercises. Students should come to class fully willing to participate and are expected to try new techniques and interact with one another during non-lecture portions of the class. The course also implements the Faculty of Law's commitments to understanding law in social context and, in particular, its relationship to social justice, by examining the principles of administrative law in relation to social and cultural differences. The course seeks to promote critical thinking in general.

EVALUATION METHODOLOGY (SUBJECT TO CHANGE)

Evaluation consists of an open book, sit-down final examination worth 100% of your grade to be administered during the fall 2010 final examination period. The format of the final examination may include essay, short answer, fact patterns, multiple choice, true/false, and/or other questions. Copies of previous exams are on reserve at the Law Library for review.
